They maturally stayed on shore up to the last minute.

It was late at night when they left the dock at Lerwick, and very dark and stormy. The breeze was blowing a thirty-knot clip. The tide, which runs very hard on this part of the coast, was also against them. The war ship's hull was barely visible when they started out into the teeth of the gair, but in ten minutes it was lost to view.

The launch, unable to reach the vessel, drove on to the shore at Brassay and grounded. The men were thrown into the heavy surf and saved the needees with difficulty, some of them having to swim ashore. The slares had been given on board the war ship when the launch disappeared, and with the aid of the searchilight the position of the men was ascertained and they were safely brought on board in a large steam launch.
